Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation and U.S. Agency for International International (USAID) recently announced a $10 million incentive fund to kickstart financial services by mobile phones in Haiti and to help speed up the delivery of cash assistance from humanitarian organizations. This initiative provides the basis for advanced banking services to help millions of Haitians lift themselves out of extreme poverty. This will allow Haitians to send, receive and store money using their mobile phones, since only 10% of the population has ever used a commercial bank. The fund will offer cash awards to companies that initiate mobile financial services in Haiti. The first company to launch a mobile money service that meets certain criteria in the next six months will receive $2.5 million. The second operator to launch and reach these benchmarks within 12 months will receive $1.5 million. Another $6 million will be allocated as the first 5 million transactions take place, distributed accordingly among the operators who contributed to the total number of transactions. In the short term, mobile money services have the potential to accelerate Haiti's recovery, as more than a third of the country's bank branches, ATMs and money transfer stations are not operational. In the long term, mobile money can help millions of Haitians improve their lives through easy access to savings accounts and other financial services. source: gatesfoundation.org via cellular news subscribe to our newsletter!
